antisemitic thinking in sermons, teaching, and "public advocacy." Third, the Church as an institution, allowed the antisemitism within the Catholic-Social theological discourse to thrive, and did nothing to react against it.

In the aftermath of the Holocaust, Catholic theologians felt an urgent need to reassess the Church's relations with Jews and Judaism, a process that had begun quietly among biblical scholars even before World War II. In spite of these attempts, the attitude towards Judaism and the Jews were ambivalent, and permeated with supercessionist views as well as traditional anti-Judaism. This ambivalence was also expressed by the condemnation of racial antisemitism, while simultaneously tolerating political antisemitism. In the 1960s and 1970s, Jewish-Christian dialogue prospered, leading to an important Vatican document on interfaith relations, "Nostra aetate," in 1965, which emerged in the context of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965). The Catholic religion textbooks and sermons informed the Catholic laity that God's covenant with the Jews was eternal and valid. In those same years, however, a new wave of Left-wing theology began to emerge as part of "liberation theology" which would open the doors to a renewal of replacement theology in the context of the Israeli-Arab conflict.

THE REVOLUTIONARY MESSAGE OF LIBERATION THEOLOGIES

In the 1960s, encouraged by the new and vibrant dialogue opened up by Vatican II, the Church began to discuss current social concerns: peace, human rights, and the role of Christianity in the international order.[8] Grounded in the universalistic aspirations of missionary work and the new evaluation of non-Christian creeds and cultures, the "social justice" messages found a sympathetic public in Latin America, where a group of bishops and priests initiated a new theology directed to the masses living under severe economic inequalities and tyrannical regimes.[9] This theological approach paralleled the black liberation movement in the United States and in South Africa, where Protestant and other non-Catholic churches also elaborated their own liberation theologies.[10] The call for Christian resistance paved the way to a shared revolutionary ecumenism, with different denominations united in common political struggles.

Following the initiative of the Peruvian Gustavo Gutiérrez, bishops and clergy from Latin America founded "liberation theology" in 1968. Gutiérrez offered new meaning to the traditional Christian message: the figure of Jesus was now seen as the leader of the oppressed, liberating not only from sin, but also from tyranny and suffering.[11] One basic tenet of this theology is that God Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,