supranational and universalist message. Kairos South Africa is a theological-political document that denounces colonialist, racist oppression and calls for resistance, interpreted as non-violent struggle in accordance with the teachings of Christian love.[20] This increasingly politicized theology was primarily directed toward the racist regime of apartheid South Africa—denouncing perverted interpretations of Scripture elaborated by the Afrikaner Dutch Reformed Church, which had sanctioned racially supremacist views.[21] These same concepts became central to the development of Palestinian theology and the subsequent elaboration of the 2009 Kairos Palestine Document.

PALESTINIAN REPLACEMENT THEOLOGY

Palestinian theology combines traditional anti-Judaism as developed by the Catholic-Social movement and concepts of liberation theology directed towards the demonization of Israel, the delegitimization of Zionism, and the replacement of Jews by Palestinians. This replacement theology has given a new meaning to the traditional Christian idea of "substitution" of the people of Israel by the Church in the covenant with God. It also rewrites biblical history in such a way as to replace the historic people of Israel by the Palestinians.[22] In this sense, it is a replacement theology adapted to the Arab-Israeli conflict, "nationalizing" its principles and tailoring them to the Palestinian cause.

Palestinian theology was developed in the 1980s by ecclesiastics such as Hilarion Cappucci (involved in a scandal for smuggling weapons into the West Bank) and Michel Sabbah, later Patriarch of Jerusalem. In 1989, the first book on Palestinian theology, Justice and Only Justice, was published by Naim Ateek, a former Anglican canon and director of the Sabeel Ecumenical Center in (East) Jerusalem.[23] Palestinian theological literature began to flourish in the 1990s: in the Catholic press through the writings of Rafiq Khoury and Geries Khoury; in Protestant writings by the Lutheran pastor Mitri Raheb; and among Greek Orthodox authors such as Theodosium Atallah Hanna. Hanna, it may be noted, had been accused of incitement to hatred and terrorism. Despite historical rivalries and theological differences, the Palestinian Christian community has elaborated an ecumenical, inter-denominational political theology, largely nationalistic, openly anti-Zionist, and vaguely anti-Judaic. As in the past, the work of bishops, priests, and theologians has been crucial in evolving anti-Israel views that are reflected in the activity of several Christian organizations and also echo many Christian communities around the world.

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,