this one execrates the Zionist regime, promoting "Christian resistance" and incorporating elements of Palestinian replacement theology. The novelty of the document consists of its promotion of a universal mission of the Palestinians (a version of the Jewish concept of being a "Light unto the Nations"), and its understanding of Christian love as being the duty to resist.

Jesus commanded his followers to love their enemies (Mt 5:43–44; Luke 6:27, 6:35). Kairos Palestine explains that love and justice imply rejection of that violence and "revenge" deemed typical of the Old Testament, which they characterize as a "primitive" conceptions from a brutal god.[34] Justice imposes active resistance, and love implies non-violence. However, this has not impeded justification for the armed struggle against Israel and "high esteem" for Palestinian martyrs.[35] Martyrdom is conceived in an Islamicized way, which condones violence and the practice of suicide attacks.[36] By incorporating tenets of replacement theology, the document confirms that Jewish claims on the land of Israel are merely perverted interpretations of the Bible. Kairos stresses the universal dimension of the land and of the Palestinians, since they are invested in the mission of liberating the Holy Land from the Zionist Project, perceived as evil. Furthermore, the Jewish narrative of attachment to the land and the deep historical and religious significance for the people of Israel is adapted to the Palestinian narrative, accusing Europeans of injustice in the support for the establishment of the State of Israel as a result of the Holocaust (2.3.2). The document declares Israeli policies to be racist, and notes the great suffering of Palestinians following the establishment of the state. Denouncing the "Zionist occupation" as the greatest sin, this demonizing conception is crucial to justifying a Christian duty to violently resist.[37]

Indeed, the Kairos Document reiterates that injustice in the Israel-Palestine context is rooted in evil practices stemming from distorted Zionist readings of Scriptural messages and the narrow particularistic interpretation of the Bible, which supposedly diverts the real meaning of the texts to serve the Jewish nationalistic enterprise.[38] The same message is also directed to those Christians who support Israel, known as "Christian Zionists," who are, in the view of Palestinian Liberationist theologians, guilty of the same "perversion" of the biblical and Christian message (2.3.4 and 2.4). Hence the duty of Christians is to be the "witness of justice" resisting evil and sin. This direct call for resistance embodies the revolutionary message of liberationist theologies.[39] Each Christian has a duty to love, and to fight for justice. [40] Christian resistance, however, must comply with Jesus' command to love one's enemies, which would seemingly entail non-violent acts. Thus, the Kairos document endorses the BDS (Boycott, Divest, Sanction) movement,
