considered a true form of "non-violent" response against the evil of occupation.[41]

The Kairos Palestine document manages to combine traditional antisemitic tropes (portraying Jews as sinners committed to an evil project of domination, based on perverted religious interpretation) and modern anti-Zionist claims. It gives theological sanction to the boycott of Israeli goods as part of the Christian duty to reject oppression by the perfidious Jews.

Palestine Replacement Theology reverberates among many Christian denominations, several of which have endorced the Kairos Document, echoing its advocacy for the Palestinian cause. Catholic pacifist movements like Pax Christi, as well as many mainstream Protestant churches (including Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists), and Episcopalians support these views, which have found expression in their liturgies, and in their encouragement of Christian activism. The most important Palestinian centers are Sabeel, Tantur, al-Liqa, and Dar Annadwa—International Center of Bethlehem, all of them active on many fronts, including international propaganda through pilgrimages, conferences, and media outlets.[42]

Examples of the penetration of replacement theology into liturgy and rituals include prayers that refer to Palestinian suffering. A notable instance is the version of the "Way of the Cross" that has acquired an exclusively Palestinian significance.[43] The traditional Way of the Cross familiar to Catholics and Anglicans is a devotional exercise of meditation on the final events in the life of Jesus, from his condemnation to the crucifixion. The fourteen "stations" focus reflection on the suffering and death of Jesus, on liberation from sin and redemption. In the Palestinian variant, the Christian religious themes are supplanted by the Palestinian national narrative. The first station recalls the condemnation of Jesus. The Palestianian version, however, focuses on the Nakba: just as the Roman conquerors brought devastation and destruction, so the alien Zionist occupiers have brought only catastrophe and dispossession. In the third, seventh, and ninth stations, Jesus falls under the burden of the cross. Palestinians have reinterpreted them to represent the occupation, checkpoints, and house demolitions. For the eleventh station (Jesus is nailed to the cross) and the twelfth (Jesus dies), Palestinians recall the blockade of Gaza and the "apartheid wall." The Kairos document has fostered activism, consolidating an international movement of theological centers, organizations, and churches committed to the propagation of replacement theology in order to delegitimize and demonize Israel.
