> will say, O Muslims, O Advulla [servant of Allah], there is a Jews behind me, come and kill him.[1]

For Islamists today, it is the Prophet himself who points them towards an apocalyptic genocideal resolution of the conflict with the Jews. In their view, this is not a war between Palestinians and Zionists or between the Arab states and Israel, but one between Muslims and Jews in which no compromise is possible.[2]

The Covenant relies to a great extent on a conspiracy theory drawn from the Protocols of the Elders of Zion—the Tsarist Russian forgery which has become very popular in the contemporary Arab-Muslim world. This fabrication is still widely disseminated on satellite TV and the internet, as well as being preached in mosques and spread through the mass-circulation Arabic press. In November 2002, the grotesque 41-episode extravaganza entitled "Horseman without a Horse," based on the antisemitic myths of the Protocols, was screened during Ramadan on Egyptian TV and then throughout the Arab world, reaching at least 200 million Muslim viewers. Since then the incitement has continued without respite in Iran and across the Arab world.[3]

Despite laws prohibiting "hate speech" in a number of Western countries, such propaganda has spread throughout the Muslim Diaspora during the 21st century. The results could already be seen at the time of Israel's war against Hezbollah in 2006. the trend continued during the first Gaza conflict (January 2009) and again throughout the summer of 2014. In Paris, before and after Bastille Day (14 July 2014), the pro-Palestine demonstrators, including many North African Muslim Arabs and some white Leftists, were screaming slogans like "Death to the Jews" before assaulting local synagogues. In Berlin, too, the third Gaza war provoked ugly protests, especially among Turkish Muslims, with a clear antisemitic focus and mocking cries aimed at "cowardly Jewish pigs"—calling them to "come out and fight."

In fundamentalist Islamic terms it is apparent that the existence of Israel can never be accepted and that no binding agreements can ever be made with those whom the Qur'an unequivocally refers to as "sons of apes and swine." In this religious dispensation jews are irrevocably cursed. They are infidels and disbelievers "laden with God's anger," permanently doomed to "abasement and poverty"—a position as extreme as any that was ever held in the dismal history of Christian antisemitism.

The dramatic rise of the global jihad since the al-Qaida-orchestrated assaults in the United States on September 11, 2001, gave a tremendous impetus to the religious imperative behind jihadi antisemitism. Yet the phenomenon is not in itself new, first acquiring real political momentum in
