other barbaric acts were the result of Islamic religious fanaticism. Absurdly, both Britain's Prime Minister David Cameron and America's President Obama insisted that Islamic State, which had declared an Islamic caliphate, had nothing to do with Islam—although subsequently Cameron alternated this with acknowledging that Islamic State adhered to "an interpretation of Islam."

Britain had been turning a blind eye to Islamic fanaticism for more than three decades. Indeed, so hospitable had it been to Islamic radicals that it was contemptuously dubbed Londonistan by the French secret service. With immigration controls that had all but collapsed, and a judiciary so obsessed with human rights that it refused to deport foreign terrorist suspects on the grounds that they risked ill-treatment where they came from, London became the terrorist-financing and money-laundering centre of the world.

Not only did it refuse to take appropriate action against Islamist extremists on the streets of Britain—the security service often wanted them out in the open where it could monitor them, the universities refused to act against Islamic fanatics on campus radicalising young Muslims, the government refused to act against Islamist imams in the jails recruiting prisoners to the jihad—but the government was greedy for Muslim money.

The former Prime Minister, Gordon Brown, said he wanted to make the City of London the world center for Islamic banking—which it duly became, ignoring the connections between zakat money, or tithed charitable Muslim donations, and Hamas and Hezbollah; and ignoring also that with such funding comes increasing control and influence.

So it is that Britain is increasing being bought up by the Islamic world. Saudi Arabia and Gulf states have been buying university chairs in Islamic studies, and thus controlling that curriculum. Emirates owns a football stadium and the Olympic cable car across the Thames. Qatar owns Harrods and Christie's, has financed the iconic Shard building, helped buy the Olympic Village site and funded much else. As a result, Qatar—the principal backer of Islamic State, against which Britain went to war—has been tirelessly courted by Downing Street, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and the Royal family. Meanwhile, various arms of the establishment—the former Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Rowan Williams, the former Lord Chief Justice Lord Phillips, the Law Society of England and Wales—have all welcomed an accommodation with Islamic sharia law. Yet sharia recognises no secular authority above itself and, if encouraged in this way, threatens to establish a parallel jurisdiction in the UK and thus destroy the core precept of a democracy, that of one rule of law for all.
