In the United States, the authoritative Investigative Project on Terrorism has detailed how the White House has been eliminating the term "radical Islam" and similar language in its counter-terrorism programs. It points out that jihadist terror organisations are effectively silencing discourse on college campuses or in the media that might offend followers of Islam. More disturbingly, it says that the chief partners of the Obama administration in its outreach to the Muslim community are Islamist groups with Muslim Brotherhood origins—a relationship which has given these groups unprecedented influence within the U.S. government while boosting their stature as representatives of the Muslim-American community.

Yet at same time, Britain and the United States are under assault from the Islamic world, from within as well as without. The attack takes two forms: infiltration and terror. In July 2014, an inquiry into Islamist infiltration of British schools in Birmingham found evidence of "a sustained, coordinated agenda to impose segregationist attitudes and practices of a hardline, politicised strain of Sunni Islam." MI5 has said there are in Britain at least 2,000 active known Islamic terror supporters, maybe double that number—and that was before hundreds of young British Muslims travelled to Syria to join Islamic State and other Islamic terrorist groups telling them to wage war on the west. Yet by insisting that Islamic State has nothing to do with Islam, both Cameron and Obama are reinforcing their refusal to acknowledge the reality of the Islamic jihad and thus ensuring they will fail properly to defend their countries against it.

Worse still, both the United States and UK have exacerbated the threats against the free world and undermined its defences. Having disastrously misread the so-called "Arab Spring" as heralding the arrival of democracy in the region, Obama and Cameron helped replace tyrants whom the west had brought more or less on side by tyrants who were pledged to the west's destruction. Helping oust Colonel Gaddafy in Libya created lawless chaos in that country, exploited by Islamic extremists whose access to sophisticated weaponry there posed the gravest threats to the west. Helping oust President Mubarak in Egypt brought to power the Muslim Brotherhood, whose fanaticism ensured they were then ousted by the Egyptians themselves.

Worse still, President Obama has seemed determined to empower the enemies of the west. Although Egypt's President Sisi hardly provides Egyptians with human rights, he is essential to regional stability and western interests in keeping down the Muslim Brotherhood and other Islamist extremists. Yet Sisi has been repeatedly undermined by President Obama, who has refused to sell him arms and who has made deals instead with Qatar—which backs the Brotherhood, Hamas, and Isis.
