CHAPTER THREE

Antisemitism/Anti-Zionism: Primal Pillars in Europe's Decay

Bat Ye'or

Antisemitism today can no longer be appraised just as a localized, territorial, ethno-cultural phenomenon. In our global age it encompasses many sources and supports several strategies combining anti-Zionism with a trans-continental Western globalist strategy aimed at replacing the democratic institutions of nation-states by global governance. Anti-Zionism in the West developed and was closely related to the post-colonial European Community's oil and Mediterranean policy related to both Israel and domestic EU policy. Another type of anti-Zionism rooted, however, in a totally different ideology emanates from the Arab and Muslim world. This trend fuses with and molds EU anti-Israel policy, influences its Mediterranean and globalist strategy, spreading through transnational and international networks. The main proponents of anti-Zionism are the EU and the Organization of Islamic Cooperation (OIC).

The chronology of this trend can be summarized as follows:

- 1966–1970: De Gaulle's policy of funding French pro-Arab movements to bind together the two shores of the Mediterranean Sea.
- 1970–1973: the extension of this policy under French pressure as a coordinated European Community policy regarding Israel.
- 1973–1993: the creation of an unofficial body, the Euro-Arab Dialogue, with specialized and coordinated commissions implemented throughout the European Community and funded by the European Commission. This body triggered two integrated and interrelated movements: the European Community's anti-Israel policy and a Muslim immigration policy within Europe.

Muslim immigration within the EC was seen from the outset as a major factor cementing the North-South integrative process. The success of this revolutionary project hung on Europe's support for the newly baptized "Palestinian people," who needed a country.[1] The creation of Palestine was seen as an
