essential requirement by the member-states of the Arab League to improve their relations with Europe.

By the end of the 20th century and the beginning of the 21st, these two tactics—support for Palestinian goals and Muslim immigration into the EU—concurred in the same global strategy aimed at suppressing territorial nations, blending ethnic, historic, and cultural European specificities within Muslim immigration and reinforcing the dynamic toward a global UN governance. The main proponents of this strategy were Romano Prodi, President of the European Commission (1999–2004), Chris Patten, European Commissioner for External Relations (1999–2004) and Javier Solana, EU High Representative for the Common Foreign and Security Policy (October 1999–November 2009).

THE BACKGROUND

Before and during World War II, the Fascist and Nazi regimes as well as their collaborationist allies had strong ties with the Arab and Muslim countries. Amin al-Husseini (1895–1974), Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, emerges as the most prominent figure of this alliance. During the 1914–1918 war, al-Husseini had served in the Ottoman army allied with Imperial Germany and the Austro-Hungarian Empire. He joined the Muslim Brotherhood Movement, created in Egypt by Hassan al-Banna (1928), representing its Palestinian branch. The Brotherhood opposed English colonialism in Islamic lands, Westernization, Zionism, and all non-Muslim political and cultural rights. It strove for the restoration of the Caliphate abolished by Kemal Ataturk in 1924. Having witnessed the eradication of the Armenian, Greek, and Assyrian independence movements, al- Husseini was determined to eliminate Zionism in the same manner. Nominated Grand Mufti of Jerusalem by the British colonial administration in Palestine, he used threats to rally Arab Christians and fomented a terrorist war against the Palestinian Jews. From the mid-1930s al-Husseini received massive support from both the Italian Fascist and Nazi regimes.

Military and cultural ties forged between Imperial Germany and the Ottoman Arab provinces during World War I increased during World War II. After an aborted coup against the British in Iraq and a pogrom fomented against the Jews in Baghdad (Farhud), al-Husseini flew to Berlin in 1941. Faithful to Hitler, he remained there until 1945, winning over Muslims from Caucasia, Crimea, Bosnia, Albania, and other regions of occupied Europe to the Nazi cause, as well as Arab jihadist volunteers.
