of the second International Conference in Support of the Arab Peoples sponsored by the French Foreign Office. It assembled delegates from seventy-four countries and fifteen international organizations representing a wide spectrum of politicians, public opinion makers and intellectuals. According to the organizers, the chief object of the Cairo Conference was to emphasize hostility to Zionism and affirm a European solidarity with the Arab population of Palestine. In its Appeal, the Conference stressed that "all information media should be mobilized to enlighten world public opinion kept in ignorance and confusion by deceitful propaganda on the part of Israel and its supporters."

It was "an incumbent moral and political duty of all participants to this conference to reveal the truth and spread it through the press, radio, television, demonstrations, visits of delegations, and the organization of seminars and conferences in the West and through all continents."[7]

The Conference issued twenty-three resolutions on mobilization, among them the following practical measures:

> (1) Special committees to be established to coordinate activities on this issue. Such activities to be directed in the way most suitable to the individual conditions of each country. Special committees can be created or maintained on particular issues.
> (7) To appeal to all international and national organizations and committees to organize public demonstrations, exhibitions, publications, films, etc., dealing with the background, causes, current events, Israeli atrocities, refugees, Palestinian resistance, etc., according to the possibilities in each country.
>
> (9) Special emphasis to be placed on the mobilization of public opinion in countries where governments are taking a negative stand or helping Israeli aggression.
> (15) The conference decides to form special parliamentary groups, where they do not exist, and to use the parliamentary platform for promoting support to the Arab people and the Palestinian resistance.
>
> (19) Decides to organize two seminars on the Middle East issue, one in Western Europe and one in the USA.
> (22) To organize, on return from this Conference, special meetings, publications, and utilise [sic] the press, radio and television media to popularise [sic] the decisions of this Conference in the most appropriate way for each individual country.

European pro-Arab policy grew despite a spate of airplane hijackings and terrorist attacks perpetrated in the late 1960s by the PLO in European cities. Palestinian terror organizations benefited from empathy and encouragement
