among the countless ex-Nazis and collaborationist officials, former ministers, diplomats, army officers and intellectuals who had recycled themselves in influential positions in post-war European society. Maintaining their links with the war criminals exfiltrated to the Arab countries, they established a complex network of political solidarity and economic interests. The war against the Jews waged in World War II did not stop in 1945: its ideology and tactics continued through other channels.

The propagandists of this movement applied the decisions of the Cairo Symposium and created networks throughout the European community, triggering a unified European anti-Zionist and pro-Palestinian movement. Eurabia is one of their publications. Its director was Lucien Bitterlin and Robert Swann its chief editor. Eurabia was edited by the European Committee of Friendship Societies with the Arab world (Comité Européen des Associations d'Amitié avec le Monde arabe) created in 1973. The following associations collaborated: Middle East International (London), France-Pays Arabes (Paris), and Groupe d'Etude sur le Moyen-Orient (Geneva).

Up to 1973, in spite of its efforts France had failed to coordinate a unified pro-Arab European Community policy against Israel. But the Egyptian-Syrian war against Israel (October 1973), followed by an Arab oil embargo succeeded in coercing the West. On November 6, 1973 the nine European Community member-states issued a joint resolution whereby they recognized a Palestinian people, Yasser Arafat as its leader, and adopted the French interpretation of Security Council Resolution 242. Cooperation was then established between the EEC (European Economic Community) and Arab countries by an informal structure called the Euro-Arab Dialogue.

The next steps applied a number of resolutions of the 1969 Cairo Conference sponsored by Paris:

- Creation of the Parliamentary Association for Euro-Arab Cooperation (PAEAC) founded in Paris, 23–24 March 1974, on the joint initiative of the French Gaullist MP (UDR) Raymond Offroy and the British Labor MP Christopher Mayhew. Offroy was president of the Parliamentary group called France-Arab Countries (France-Pays Arabes) created in November 1973. As for the anti-Zionist Mayhew, in 1974 he had left the Labor Party then led by the pro-Israel Harold Wilson. Mayhew co-founded with Michael Adams an association similar to the French one created by Offroy: It was known as the Council for Arab-British Understanding (CAABU). These two associations were the nucleus of the economic, cultural and political dynamic that generated Eurabian society a few decades
