the internal politics of the EEC: the promotion in European countries of an extensive immigration of Muslims who would enjoy the same social, political and national rights as the indigenous populations and benefit from positive discrimination. Such political activism complied with the requirements of Arab countries especially their insistent and repeated demands for the propagation of Islam and the Arabic language in Europe to further the rapprochement between the two shores of the Mediterranean.[8]

The standardization of EC/EU (European Community/European Union) foreign policy set in motion in 1974 required coordination by the European Commission between member states. PAEAC (a body helped by the European Commission and under its aegis) was the instrument to cement the unification of EU policies, both global in relation to Israel, America, and the fifty-six Muslim countries of the OIC, and in the domestic policy of the EU regarding Muslim immigration.

After the attacks of 9/11, a sequence of crises prompted by President Bush's commitment to the "war on terror" and the 2003 Iraq war provoked a feverish anti-Americanism within the EU, bound as it was to the Arab world. Under the presidency of Romano Prodi, the European Commission derided America and strengthened its allegiance to Arafat in the hope of defusing Arab terrorist threats. Common institutional mechanisms between Europe and Arab countries were stepped up, aiming at greater Euro-Arab political and cultural integration. Concurrently, a campaign of boycott and the systematic defamation of Israel unfolded.

Europe's anti-Israel policy and its Mediterranean strategy which includes Muslim immigration in Europe proceeded from the same ideology. European leaders promoted the suppression in Israel and in the EU of borders and the fading away of national culture and history linked to a specific territory in pursuance of a globalized world. The EU denial of Israel's history and of its national patrimony (transferred to the Muslim Arab Palestinians),paralleled the rejection of European national identities. Instead, multiculturalism was promoted in compliance with the continuous flow of an immigration linked to Muslim culture, history, and values.

The parliamentarians of the PAEAC represented the parties of each member-state of the EU. They acted in conformity with their own party's views, both in relation to Israel and the transformation of Europe by Muslim demographic, political, and religious growth. Together with Arab League countries under the umbrella of the Euro-Arab Dialogue—a formula credited to Moroccan-born Michel Jobert, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs (1971–1973)—this Arab-Muslim and Palestinian lobby managed to insert itself into each European party in both the European Parliament and
