Commission. Its aims were clearly stated: to build strong solidarity and political ties with the Arab and Muslim world within a new common strategy, and to increase commerical links.[9] Supporting Palestine, and using the Palestinians to isolate the State of Israel was both an explicit and at times an implicit objective of this alliance.

Well-funded and abetted by political parties as well as European governments, these parliamentarians and their networks translated their fervor into a pro-Palestinian passion that invariably inflamed anti-Jewish sentiment. Supported by the churches, the media, and politicians in Europe, they promoted the delegitimation of Israel, militated for its suppression, and justified Palestinian terrorism as "resistance" against "occupation." With the same fanaticism they fought on the home front to secure multiculturalism, positive discrimination in favor of Muslims, and unrestricted immigration. Parliamentarians of PAEAC were loyal agents and disseminators of OIC policy in Europe.

The Euro-Arab dialogue, with its numerous bodies and Euro-Arab mixed commissions and sub-commissions linked to a nexus of NGOs (non-governmental organizations), has created a powerful transnational structure for spreading anti-Zionism. Its determined efficiency emerged in the early years of the 21st century under European leaders intimidated by 9/11 and the terror attacks in Madrid (2004) and London (2005). Muslim terrorism triggered anti-Jewish and anti-Israel violence as well as a BDS (Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions) campaign in Europe. Romano Prodi obtained from the European Council the creation of the Anna Lindh Foundation (2003) dedicated to work for Euro-Muslim rapprochement on two fronts: intensive pro-Palestinian propaganda and censorship of any dissident or critical views on Islam within the EU.

While courting Arafat, the EU Foreign Policy representative Javier Solana preached the Islamic narrative of history and a stronger globalized world with increased power for the UN dominated by the OIC. As part of the wider European anti-Israel fervor, Chris Patten—the EU Commissioner for External Relations—intensified his pressure on Bush to weaken America's support for Israel, while encouraging Palestinian and anti-Israel European NGOs. With the Alliance of Civilizations (2005), whose declared mission is the reconciliation of the West with Islam, a huge UN organization adopted and further spread the Palestinian narrative and anti-Zionism as a global culture and policy.

Since 1974 when Europe decreed the existence of a Palestinian people with Arafat (whom they controlled) as its sole leader, it has repeatedly stated that any Israeli presence in Judea and Samaria (the historic heartland of the
