are the experts and the politicians speaking? If by this they mean learning about Judaism and its role in world history, supporting tolerance and friendship among the monotheistic religions, and studying the Holocaust even through youth visits to Auschwitz, then contemporary reality shows us bluntly that all this is not enough. Nobody could say that these strategies have not already been put into action. For instance, the European Union's Fundamental Rights Agency has elaborated a project on human rights and Holocaust education which comprises research, toolkits, networks of teachers and educators, as well as conferences and exhibitions.[1] In 2009, a summit of forty-six European countries, including non-EU member states, met in Prague to discuss Jewish properties stolen during the Nazi era and the integrity of Holocaust memorials.[2] Schools in virtually every European country include classes and intiatives to teach the students about the Holocaust. For instance, every year the President of the Italian Republic grants awards to the winners of the national writing contest, "Youngsters Remember the Shoah," which takes place at all levels of the school system. Every year an impressive number of people visit the Auschwitz memorial. In 2010, a peak of 1.38 million visitors was recorded, among them around 850,000 young people, schoolchildren and students. Most of the visitors—more than 500,000—came from Poland. Among foreigners, the British led the field with 84,000 visitors, followed by 74,000 Italians, and 68,000 Germans.[3]

Nevertheless, the same Fundamental Rights Agency in 2013 removed its "working definition of antisemitism," which had also included references to anti-Israel slander as a form of the new antisemitism.[4] And in 2014, the EU High Representative for Foreigh Policy, Baroness Catherine Ashton, gave a speech for Holocaust Memorial Day in which not only did she not mention Israel, but even ignored the Jews.[5]

What is missing today is not the history of persecution against the Jews in the past, but the in-depth history of the current demonization of the State of Israel. What is missing is the demonstration that the lies fabricated about Israel's origin, behavior, and nature must be considered as falsifications of history and not as a form of "free speech" about the State of Israel. Terms like "ethnic cleansing" and "apartheid," along with comparison of the Jews to the Nazis, should be removed from the public discourse if we want to engage in a really effective fight against antisemitism. Indeed, when we hear crowds shouting "Death to the Jews," it is almost always in connection to whatever Israel is alleged to be doing.

French President François Hollande is right when he vows to fight antisemitism, but the question is, how?[6] His Prime Minister, Manuel Valls, even acknowledged that there have been mistakes in the way antisemitism has
