been fought in the past, and that the direct connections between the hatred against Jews and Israel is self-evident.[7] Nevertheless, they should dare to publicly denounce the chants of "Death to the Jews" as manifestations of the same hatred that fabricates false accusations about Israeli crimes during the Gaza war. They should not be surprised, considering the past of their nation, to discover that, in the last decades, hatred against the Jews fuses perfectly with the history of an irrational hatred against Israel. The growth of Muslim immigration to Europe has created an ever-larger popular base for the violent growth of this antisemitism rooted in "Israelophobia."

This pattern of waves of antisemitism in connection to the Arab-Israeli conflict has constantly recurred across Europe in the past forty years. The anti-Israel coverage in European media is certainly one of the main expressions and causes of this unfortunate process. During the First Lebanon War, the French Jewish community was the victim in attacks such as that in 1982 on the Jo Goldenberg kosher restaurant in Paris, carried out by the Abu Nidal Palestinian terror organizaton.[8] The same year, a group of Palestinian militants bombed the Great Synagogue in Rome, murdering the three-year-old Stefano Gay Taché.[9] Also in 1982, Palestinian nationalists attacked the Mifgash-Israel Jewish restaurant in Berlin, injuring more than twenty people.[10] During the Second Intifada, when Israel experienced numerous suicidal attacks against its civilian population, Jewish life in Europe was also made almost unbearable by antisemitic attacks in "revenge" for alleged Israeli crimes against the Palestinians. In 2003, a Paris synagogue was ransacked and young Jews were physically assaulted outside the premises of a Jewish youth association.[11] In Berlin, a wave of antisemitic vandalism occurred in Jewish cemeteries.[12] In Britain, London and Manchester synagogues were vandalized and set on fire, while in Turkey, a Jewish dentist was killed in an antisemitic hate crime.[13] It is quite usual that attacks on Israel are accompanied by assaults on Jews in Europe. The activists who fight antisemitism, including Jewish community leaders, need to realize that their strategy must shift from fighting mostly anti-Jewish hatred to fighting against anti-Israel hatred, i.e., Israelophobia.

In this respect, I refer not just to the anti-Israel hatred arising from the radical left, but also to the neo-Nazi and neo-Fascist political right. They are not only classic, but also modern antisemites. The most blatant example is the Hungarian extreme right party, Jobbik, which was remarkably successful in the last elections. The party's deputy group leader, Márton Gyöngyösi, in November 2012 demanded that Jewish Hungarians in public office be listed, for "security reasons." Jobbik considers the security issue to be that Jews actually serve a foreign power—Israel.[14] A May 2012 rally promoted by
