average in support of this obscene falsehood ran at around 40 percent. So how can a Jew be a good person if he supports these criminal minds? According to the last ADL poll (published in May 2014, before Operation Protective Edge), one billion people are "highly infected" by antisemitism.[29] \thus, one in four people that you meet on the street has some deep prejudice about the Jews. If a Jew wants to take a quiet walk, he could do it only in Laos, where antisemites are less than one percent; while in Gaza and in the West Bank, 93 percent of the people you meet think that the Jews are despicable from any point of view, including even the peace activists.

These figures show that contemporary antisemitism is connected only partially with the growth of the extreme right in Europe itself, a consequence of the failure of European institutions to confront the economic crisis and the challenges of globalization. Specifically, immigration and its related social problems have always been ignored by liberals and the governing elites of Europe. Indeed by neglecting the question of immigration as politically incorrect, the liberal elites and the left have abandoned the popular classes, which now turn to the Euro-skeptic right. The right wing momentum in the elections of May 2014 for the European Parliament doubtless contributed to the increase of racist attitudes toward foreigners and "socially diverse groups."

This is not a healthy development for Jews, but we must make no mistake. Antisemitism is not the direct result of it, and we must not keep fighting antisemitism in only its traditional form, attributing it to neo-Fascism or to a neo-Nazi resurgence. This would be a massive error and anachronism. Today, only a small minority of nostalgic neo-Fascists or neo-Nazis would admit to be racially or religiously antisemitic. Traditional antisemitism does not suit modern Europe, which is little interested in blaming the Jews for killing Jesus. Today, the powerful, pitiless, selfish Israel that "colonizes" the Palestinians is the villain.

By underestimating Israelophobia (the new antisemitism), for both the Right and the Left, and overemphasizing right-wing racism, the liberal side of the European political spectrum avoids scrutinizing its own problems and responsibilities. The liberals are generally convinced that they are the best fighters against antisemitism, but this is simply not true. On the contrary, antisemitism, as Robert Wistrich shows in his two last books, is deeply rooted in the leftist tradition and it has developed into blatant Israelophobia.[30]

The Left has found many expressions for its anti-Zionism in the post-Soviet world. There are the NGOs, the anti-globalist ideology, the anti-colonialist movements, the non-aligned countries, and the Muslim countries. There is a thriving globalized Israelophobia from Sweden to the Far East. It
