has been finely developed and elaborated by the UN and its numerous agencies, including the Human Rights Council and UNESCO. The anti-Israel obsession of the UN has a very long tradition and enjoyed a major articulation in the 1975 UN resolution equating Zionism with racism—revoked only in 1991. The UN, alongside human rights groups, EU institutions, the Church, and the international media, has devoted an extraordinary amount of effort to developing Israelophobia, through resolutions, articles, books, and texts that constitute a million-page library, as broad as the classic anti-Jewish theological and secular literature. Since its establishment in 2006 and until the end of 2012, the UN Human Rights Council dedicated no less than 46 of 103 country-related resolutions, and 6 of the 19 special sessions it held to Israel.[31] Last March, the Human Rights Council voted five resolutions against Israel in one single day.[32]

Conclusion

There is no magic way to defeat the immense propaganda machine of contemporary antisemitism. Nevertheless, we have the chance of changing direction and aiming mostly at defending Israel. We need courage and devotion in this fight. We must bring to Israel as many MPs, intellectuals, business leaders, and military personnel as we can. We need to move our efforts from denouncing traditional antisemitism to directly attacking Israelophobia. We must push back against the BDS (boycott-divest-sanction) campaigns, including the EU-promoted initiatives to label Israeli products made in the disputed territories, the anti-Israel demonstrations, the accusations of racism, the denial of the historical Jewish connection to the Land of Israel, and Jewish claims on Jerusalem. We must fight attempts to delegitimize Israel's right to self-defense, and seek to heal any rifts between Israel and the Diaspora.

We need to remember that Israel can count on large islands of sympathy among political, intellectual, scientific, military, and business communities around the world. In order to mobilize political and social leaders, we must not focus on the past, but on the current attacks against Israel. The technological-cyber dimension, where Israel excels, needs to be mobilized. Israel has incredible start-ups in this field, and the world can ill afford to ignore them. Nor should we forget that countries like Canada and Australia have stood courageously against the calumnies spread at Israel's expense.

In conclusion, let me recall the oratory marathon "For the Truth, for Israel," which we held in Rome in 2010. Hundreds of non-Jewish intellectuals, politicians, journalists, and authors participated, expressing their
