taken even further. South Africans believe that the Palestinians were offered "Bantustans" at Camp David, akin to what the "homeland" leaders were offered under apartheid. This would replicate the historic migrant labor system so powerful in South African consciousness, writes Ronnie Kasrils.

> The Zionist project of an exclusive Jewish state in Palestine resulted in the dispossession, dispersion and domination of the Palestinian people. . . . The West Bank will be divided into separate cantons or prison cages, as is the case with the Gaza Strip. Clear parallels arise with the border industries of the apartheid system which drew on labour from the Bantustans. Adjacent to Gaza and the West Bank are plans for at least five industrial parks in Israel to be situated close to the wall. Once the West Bank and Gaza economies are ruined, the unemployed farmers and workers will have no choice but to sell their labour in the Israeli industrial zones.[40]

It is within this context that the BDS movement has had such resonance in South Africa. Fully aware that it is the lynchpin of the international movement, BDS South Africa does its best to keep the issue alive by constant airing of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Driven largely by Muslims, a single-state solution is now demanded. The activists connect internationally, appear to be well funded, and employ sophisticated methods, rooted in universal human rights. Importantly, the Muslim population is relatively well-educated and well placed in the corridors of power. University administrations encourage and support BDS activism—sometimes even materially.

Put simply, for many in South Africa, including some radical Jews, Zionism is a nineteenth-century ethno-national movement inappropriate for the twenty-first century. As Hermann Giliomee, a leading South African historian, has put it, South Africa is informed by > a dogmatic or intransigent universalism. Its point of departure is that race or ethnicity as a principle of social organization is essentially irrational and ephemeral and that there is no need to make any concessions to it. What this boils down to is the unshakeable conviction that there is not much more to racial or ethnic identification than the legacy of apartheid classification.[41]

This mind-set runs counter to the notion of a Jewish state. Zionism as a liberation movement is forgotten: the term has become associated with exclusivism and expansionism. "It's a policy that to me looks like it has very many parallels with racism," explains Nobel Laureate, Archbishop Emeritus, Desmond Tutu.[42] In this worldview, Jewish suffering in the diaspora and the dramatic rebirth of the Jewish state is of no import. Nightly television

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,