ambivalent figure emerges—one that is familiar from modernist constructs of the "cosmopolitan" who is uneasy in modernity, but is forced to confront its history of violence.[3] The image of the "Jew" in postcolonial criticism is often benign or ambiguous, as the archetypal cosmopolitan transnational migrant, at home everywhere, with roots nowhere. A good example is the eminent postcolonial theorist Homi Bhabha's critique of Salman Rushdie's Satanic Verses (1988). At the end of The Location of Culture, Bhabha identifies the Armenian Jewish Mimi Mamoulian's mimicry as the "siren song" of postcolonial global migrancy.[4] From the postcolonial view of the subaltern, Jews are both the ultimate cosmopolitan migrants and collectively associated with the exploitation (as a global plutocracy) of disadvantaged minority populations.

Anti-colonialism set a dilemma for Jews on the left, such as French writer and critic Albert Memmi, whose faith in universalism was shattered by the Holocaust and France's own collaboration under Vichy in the deportation of the Jews. As he writes in Portrait of a Jew (1962), when Zionism was excluded from postcolonial discourse, Memmi, a supporter of the Tunisian liberation movement, was forced to look for Jewish solutions to universal issues, rather than universal solutions to the Jewish problem.[5] Memmi concluded in Portrait du colonisé, précédé par Portrait du colonisateur (1957) that the Jews were trapped in an ambiguous position between Arab nationalists in a liberation movement ostensibly freeing them from oppression and the French colonizers, with whom they wished to assimilate and thus escape Jewish difference.[6]

There existed, already in the 1960s, ambivalence in the link between sympathy evinced for Jews as victims of the Holocaust and the solidarity with the struggle against colonialism, such as the Algerian war for independence from France. The double legacy that drove Jean-Paul Sartre to identify with the Algerian independence movement in the same way that he identified with the Jews deported in wartime France was weakened by the Suez crisis of 1956 in which Israel was allied with Franco-British forces. After May 1968 the New Left no longer felt the need for sympathy with Israel or the Jews.[7]

In a passage in Frantz Fanon's Black Skin, White Masks, which has become a topos classicus of postcolonial theory, Fanon recalls his philosophy professor, a native of the Antilles, telling him that an antisemite is inevitably anti-Negro.

> "Whenever you hear anyone abuse the Jews, pay attention, because he is talking about you." And I found he was universally right—by which I meant that I was answerable in my body and in my heart for what Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,