The immediate context for this passage is Fanon's puzzlement, as a Black soldier fighting for the Allies in World War Two, to find European colonialism brought home to Europe and antisemitism coupled with racism against Blacks when hearing a drunkard on a train lump Blacks together with Jews as foreigners in France. Bryan Cheyette has shown there is a tension in this passage between identification in body and in spirit, as if Black identification with Jews as fellow victims of racism could be disembodied. This must be understood, Cheyette explains, in terms of the heterogeneity that Fanon perceived in Algerian Jewry, some of whom were assimilated and Francophone (like Jacques Derrida), while others were Arabized, but only a few participated in the Algerian struggle for independence. The Jew was, for Fanon, both the victim and beneficiary of modernity, and therefore held an ambiguous position in the racial hierarchy of a Manichean binary between Black and White. The Jew is perceived as a White victimized by other European Whites, yet Fanon perceives a tension between particularism and universalism when he speaks of Jewish suffering.[9]

The modern times that W. E. B. Du Bois had called the century of the color line have passed, but for Paul Gilroy, a prominent Black British sociologist, the racial hierarchy is still very much with us. His own understanding of the complexities of what he calls "raciology" grew as he pondered the Jewish historical experience in the Holocaust and affinities between Blacks and Jews.[10] Gilroy thus reinforces the complex self-perception of Blacks aligned with the Jewish experience of antisemitism, but he separates them from Jews, whom Fanon had identified as the intellectuals feared by the Whites, just as the Black was feared by the Whites as a sexualized Other. Gilroy sees colonialism as a parallel with racial antisemitism in a comparative history of the persecution of minorities, particularly Blacks. As a result, Jews are no longer regarded as unique, though their history may be paradigmatic for other colonized or enslaved peoples; since they are no longer identified as a persecuted minority, however, they are not immune to charges of racism or oppression as Zionists or capitalists.

Postcolonial discourse operates within an attempt to think through globalized identities and their relation to human rights in a resistance to Western models of thought and the linear Western paradigm of progress. The struggle against racism places the blame for violence and exploitation on the nineteenth-century mythicization of land and nation. This is regarded as antediluvian in a globalized world of transnationalism based on solidarity
