with the victims of occupied territories in the new cosmological sense of a shared, imperiled biosphere.[11] But with the redefinition of nation as an imagined community (Benedict Anderson's phrase), the subaltern view of the Jews becomes submerged in a revision of history which privileges the Other's Other, the Palestinian Arab, and denies the Jews the right of sovereignty.[12]

Since the 1980s, as a political "philosophy," postcolonialism has turned the world upside down. As Robert J. C. Young explains, if we see things from a non-Western and non-White perspective, we may dissolve the barrier of difference and inequality between the First and Third Worlds. This difference was based on anthropological constructs of race and culture that legitimized European colonization of much of the globe in the nineteenth century.[13] In Young's postcolonial model, for example, the Israeli destruction of Palestinian Arab refugee camps becomes an archetypal image of repression of all uprooted and homeless people and of "deterritorialization" everywhere.[14] The paradox of supporting the Palestinians' national claim to statehood as a foundational belief of postcolonial theory, which is founded on a transnational principle of hybridity, is evident to Young himself. He points to the resurgence of Islamist jihadism as an alternate counter-narrative to Western history and imperialism, that espouses different values of tolerance (such as the dhimma laws) and its own radical ideology (such as al-Qaeda).[15]

Postcolonial theories of Antisemitism and Zionism

Antisemitism is increasingly recognized in textbooks on race as a model of European racism, arising from the promotion of the nation-state as a totalitarian ideology in the twentieth century. This development is introduced as an explanation of political Zionism that, in a cruel paradox, is depicted as itself guilty of an exclusivist nationalism responsible for the refugee problem after the Arabs rejected the UN Partition Plan and five Arab armies attacked the fledgling Jewish state. The ensuing "ethnic cleansing" that is alleged to have occurred illustrates for scholars of race the way Zionism turned from portraying Jews as outsiders in Europe to becoming itself a typically European colonial project, characterized by racial superiority and territorial expansion.[16] The anti-Zionist historian Ilan Pappé calls this mystical transformation the "transubstantiation" of the Jews from colonized into colonizers,[17] and it leads Slavoj Žižek to accuse "Zionism" of both Nazism and antisemitism.[18]

The mantra that Zionism has turned into a colonizing force ignores the absurdity that the tiny state of Israel could be considered as a threat to radical Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,