Arab nationalism—itself an ideology that grew out of a revolt against European colonialism. Some Marxist-Leninists think that Jews do not count as a nation, and some would deny the Jews' aspirations for sovereignty on the grounds that the nation-state was the root of all evil, responsible for racism and all forms of violence in the twentieth century. John Hutnyk, professor of cultural studies at Goldsmiths College, University of London, has decided that there is no Jewish nation, but rather that there are diverse Jewish peoples (in the plural) who were dispersed prior to the destruction of the First Temple in Jerusalem by the Babylonians. Hence, there could not conceivably be any common political or ethnic entity such as "the Jews" to claim that their forced exile justifies a return to Zion. The implications of this redefinition of diaspora for the discourse on race and Otherness are elaborated by Hutnyk as follows:

> the dialectic between whiteness [sic] and Otherness is succinctly expressed in the formation of the Israeli nation-state (created as a compensation for the Holocaust of the Second World War), but it has effectively become a representative of White supremacy with strong backing from the US government and a sanctioned systematic oppression of displaced Palestinians.[19]

In other words, the Zionist deceit that conceals alleged Israeli racism is the primal sin against the real Others—the Jews' "Jews," who are the Palestinian Arabs. The ridiculous assertion that the state of Israel is some kind of payment for European guilt for the Holocaust is offset by identification of Israelis as White settlers who have driven the "natives" from their land, so that victims of racism are presented as perpetrators.

Postcolonial theory has tended to marginalize real Jews, while inscribing a politicized narrative that constructs Zionists as European Whites who imposed modernity and Western civilization on the inferior Muslim inhabitants of the Middle East. The well-known American sociologist David Theo Goldberg racializes Israeli "Whites" who are locked in a Samson complex, powerful but blind in Gaza, an endless and senseless struggle with the local "Philistines"—though the latter actually have no historical connection with Palestinian Arabs. Goldberg's global model of the racialization of ethnic difference reintroduces color and race into the representation of Jews. They are now placed in a politicized hierarchy of oppression, which Goldberg calls the "Palestinization" of race.[20]

The Jews are no longer considered an exemplary diaspora. The reconfiguration of diaspora, especially relating to the hybrid identity of African Caribbeans, has been formulated by Stuart Hall, a leading British sociologist of race, as a metaphorical figure for heterogeneity, ruling out the
