Jewish historical experience as a false "backward-looking" diaspora bound to a sacred homeland that was regained by forcing out Arab Palestinians.[21] As Jonathan and Daniel Boyarin have noted, the disqualification of the Jewish experience as a paradigm of diaspora requires that the Zionist diaspora must be removed from the model.[22] We might say more precisely that postcolonial discourse tends to think of diaspora in terms of a transnational community of global migration. This displaces the historical understanding of the Jewish Diaspora as the dispersion of Jews in the Babylonian captivity and the Roman exile that would end with the reestablishment of a Jewish state in the land of Israel.[23] Indeed, some recent Jewish discourses about postnational diaspora identities have insisted on Judaism's intrinsic extraterritoriality and values based on forms of radical activism that are assimilable to a human rights agenda and to anti-Zionism.[24]

The problem may well be with the flatness of analogous thinking in a discourse that has tried very hard to transcend conventional boundaries of race and ethnic difference. There is a risk of reduction to analogous cases—for example, when Bhabha generalizes blackness into the marginal status of all outsiders who come late to White European modernity. In The Location of Culture, Bhabha thinks of Fanon's story of the "Dirty Nigger" in Black Skin, White Masks. Whenever Bhabha hears angry words about, among others, "the Jew in that estaminet of Antwerp, or the Palestinian on the West Bank, or the Zairian student eking out a wretched existence. . .on the Left Bank" he universalizes being treated as a "nigger" into what it means to be a marginalized and displaced Other.[25] This kind of rhetoric tends to level different situations into "a chain of subalternity."[26] Thus, the Palestinian Arab becomes an archetype of the "jew" in T. S. Eliot's poem, "Gerontion" (1920). In a revised version of this view, Bhabha has written

> [T]he "Jew" stands for that experience of a lethal modernity, shared by the histories of slavery and colonialism. In the half century since the Shoah, we have had to stand too often with, or in place of, "the Jew," taking a stance against the spread of xenophobic nationalism. To stand today besides the Palestinians, the Bosnian Muslims, the Black South Africans, or the Indian Dalits, is to occupy a position from which the very discourse of modernity is eviscerated and needs to be rewritten from a place other than its enlightened or "civilisational" origins.[27]

In this way, the Jew is displaced by the Muslim and the Black as the archetypal victim in a revised history of imperialism and neocolonialism.

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,