the scale of its rapid expansion overseas, leading to correspondingly oversize effects. Indeed, perhaps little of this would matter if China were evolving into a more liberal society, with an accountable government and more cooperative foreign policy. When Richard Nixon and the rest of world embraced China's turn from isolationism in the 1970s, they bet that the country's rise would be peaceful and that it eventually would begin to liberalize at home, adopting liberal norms of behavior. Instead, the reality is that China is a rising power dissatisfied with the contours of the current global order, suspicious of nations around it, and thus willing to test and weaken global norms in its favor. Just as concerningly, the CCP is becoming more authoritarian, and the power of the state is increasing inside society. Much of this can be laid at the feet of Xi Jinping, who took power in 2012 and has become the most powerful Chinese leader since Mao Zedong himself. Xi has scrapped the ten-year limit on presidential terms, has made himself the ideological center (or "core") of the Party, is increasingly moving toward one-man rule, and likely will remain at the head of the Chinese party-state for years to come.

Through Xi's anticorruption campaign, Beijing has reversed the separation of Party and state pursued by former leaders Deng Xiaoping and Jiang Zemin, steadily cracked down on civil society, increased domestic propaganda, muzzled alternative media, and tried to control the internet. It is also taking major steps toward becoming an authoritarian surveillance state unparalleled in recent history. Beijing has installed over one hundred million surveillance cameras and aims at having more than a half-billion over the next decade. It is investing heavily in facial and voice recognition technologies and boasts that it can find a wanted suspect anywhere in the country in minutes.[70] It is introducing a "social credit" system whereby citizens are ranked according to their social productiveness, docility, and observance of laws.[71] The government now requires the establishment of CCP cells in almost all business and social enterprises with more than three party members, thus deepening the party's reach throughout society.[72] Underpinning all this, Xi is instituting a revitalization of Communist
