- Pakistan felt that once skirmishes took place, they would raise the ante and ask for intervention and ceasefire by the UN or the West. The nuclear sabre could always be rattled.
- The provision of deniability was inbuilt in the plan as till the very end, the Pakistan Army officially maintained the façade that the intruders were mujahideen and that their army was not involved. This was a ridiculous stand to take in the face of irrefutable evidence emerging every day as the conflict raged on. Pakistani soldiers taken as POWs, a large number of identity cards of Pakistan Army, and some of the heavy weapons and equipment captured by our troops made the Pakistani position totally untenable. As a result, they blatantly disowned a large number of their dead soldiers, which is highly shameful – a stamp of disgrace that no army in the world could possibly live with. Some of their fallen soldiers, whose bodies were retrieved by the Pakistanis, were handed over to their families in Gilgit or Skardu areas at night with the instructions that the bodies should be buried before daybreak, all in the name of secrecy. The sordid facets of Operation Badr have been highlighted by both Pakistani and Indian authors:

  'Gafoor Khan, a resident of village Hamaidas, told Ilyas that, "on June 8, 1999 they got the body of his brother, Sepoy Shakur Jan of 12 NLI. His wife, three daughters and others were shocked at the furtive way in which these bodies were brought by soldiers in civil clothes in the dead of the night – as if they were bodies of criminals." There were no honours, no last post and no civic receptions.'[7]

  'Because of the lack of factual information given to the population, rumours and negative stories were bound to spread, which continue to hold sway even today.'[8]
- As a measure of surprise and deception they had used wireless operators fluent in Balti, Pushto or other Northern area dialects. Most of the transmissions were in these languages. So besides being difficult to interpret, this was another ruse to create the false impression that they were mujahideen.
