- Another false justification trotted out by General Musharraf, who has stated in his memoirs[9] that the Indians were preparing to attack in the Shaqma area in PoK, was never mentioned on any occasion either before or after the conflict. As the Pakistan Army prepared for the intrusion from October 1998 to May 1999, the Indian Army was in winter configuration.
- To accuse Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif of a sellout in Washington on 4 July, instead of taking the blame himself, was another example of passing the buck by General Musharraf. In the Pakistani system, as brought out by Bruce Reidel, in his paper on American diplomacy referred to earlier, even the preparations for possible deployment of nuclear missiles by the Pakistan Army were not known to Nawaz Sharif, and he was shown the relevant satellite photos by the Americans. Similarly, it is unlikely that he was given the full picture of what Operation Badr was all about and what it involved.

Another major adverse fallout of the jehadi cover for Operation Badr was that Pakistani media did not know how to project the actions of the Pakistan Army. In fact, they were also fed false information and accordingly kept eulogizing the initial success of the mujahideen, when they should have been praising the actions of the Pakistan Army. This was in stark contrast with the role played by the Indian media and the handling of the media by the Indian side. The electronic and the print media became force multipliers, and as described earlier, television took the war to people's living rooms. Though there was some critical reporting, by and large the media was very positive and raised the morale of the soldiers, and made every Indian feel that they were a part of the war. This was the first time such a thing had happened. We allowed the media everywhere, as we had nothing to hide. I was involved in deciding the media policy as the 'operations guy', and was the military's spokesperson or interface with the media on important occasions during the Kargil War, along with Air Commodore Bhojwani and Raminder Jassal from the ministry of external affairs. The media moulded the minds of the people worldwide, bringing out the
