order problems during five months of Gamlin's rule, the Congress decided to make a change of guard. After due consultations with the elected members of the assembly and other people's representatives, it nominated Nabam Tuki as the new chief minister. His swearing in was conducted at the Raj Bhawan by me on 1 November 2011.Tuki couldn't have got a luckier beginning as he was asked to receive an award in the 'most improved small states' category from Pranab Mukherjee, the finance minister of India, on 4 November 2011. These awards have been instituted by India Today magazine. We hope to maintain our position in 2012 also. A grassroots politician, Nabam Tuki is proving to be a worthy successor to Dorjee Khandu and is focusing on development projects and good governance. This augurs well for Arunachal Pradesh and its people. I have always maintained that the people of the state should be the biggest beneficiaries of the development process taking place. At the same time, the indigenous faith, culture and rich traditions must be preserved.

I started my military career from Nagaland in 1965 and later served in Sikkim and Arunachal Pradesh. I shall cap my services to the nation with this tenure as the governor in 2013. In 2010, I was invited to be the chief guest at the Indian Military Academy passing-out parade of the 112th Regular Course. It was a great honour to be back at my alma mater from whose haloed portals I had graduated forty-seven years ago. This occasion became all the more memorable as my ninety-year-old father, who had passed out from the same academy in 1943, was also present. Excerpts of my address to the cadets are given in Appendix 10.