- The army believes in the doctrine of the “Warrior and a Winner”. In the battlefield, the ‘Winner Takes it All” and there’s no space for the second-best

- The army rewards failure. Only leaders who have the courage to swim against the tide make mistakes. No good officer is written off for making mistakes or taking initiative that goes awry as ingenuity and creativity are important to improve processes

- The army believes that no plan survives the first engagement, howsoever brilliant it is. Changes have to be incorporated after the enemy faces the first offensive and counters it. It’s important to be dynamic and flexible in decision-making

- The army believes that money can’t bind an individual to an organisation. The ethos, work culture and scope to achieve satisfaction are more important

- Army leaders follow the dictum, “Know the way, show the way and go the way”

- The army follows the “directive style of command” where junior leaders don’t have to look over their shoulders at every stage of the battle. Flexibility and individual empowerment are important and bureaucracy doesn’t work in the battlefield
