We talk about the ultimate satisfaction of winning in Test cricket, but there was nothing remotely satisfying about that morning's play, when we wrapped up victory by an innings and 225 runs, with Graeme Swann taking five wickets. My abiding memory of it is the ICC's anti-corruption guy having a glass of red wine with his lunch. Though I suppose there was little left for him to do, it was as if nothing remotely odd had happened.

The affair left a sour taste, most notably because of the manipulation of the inexperienced Amir, who received his man-of-the-series award from a visibly disgusted Giles Clarke. For Butt, a captain, to apply such pressure is against everything the job is supposed to represent. Asif even accused him, in court, of abusing him to ensure he followed the plan. You have a responsibility to set the highest personal and professional standards.

Is there a problem with match- or spot-fixing in cricket? All but two of the major nations, Australia and England, have had prominent players banned because of it, so it is natural to worry about what goes on beneath the surface. Greed and human weakness are not specific to any one sport: just look at cycling or tennis to see the gradual erosion of trust.

As mentioned earlier in the book, I played with Mervyn Westfield for Essex. He was found to have conspired with Danish Kaneria, who, unforgivably, took six years to admit his guilt. Sport is, above all, meant to be a genuine contest. If I score 5 and 0, I want you to trust that those scores are a result of poor form, technique or decisions, or good bowling, rather than some preordained bookmakers' bingo.

I feel sorry for Pakistani cricketers, because they are paying the price for their nation's isolation, but as a Test team they have a history of turbulence. I played in the forfeited Test at the Oval in 2006, but was in the shower, having scored 83, when they were accused of ball tampering. Paul Collingwood and Ian Bell, who were at the crease, came in at tea and confirmed the ball had been changed because the umpires considered its condition had been altered.

Cue chaos. Our batsmen went back out into the middle to resume play, but the Pakistanis barricaded themselves in their changing room and refused to leave. By the time they emerged, under protest at being penalized five runs, the umpires had taken the bails off and awarded us the match, and the series, 3–0. We were ushered out of the ground, supposedly for our safety, and had to return in the morning to collect our kit. The match referee later acquitted the Pakistan captain Inzamam-al-Haq of ball tampering.
