Besides that, there are certain fundamentalist organizations like the Lashkar-e-Taiba, the Tehrike Taliban Pakistan, the Haqqani network or Jaish-e-Mohammad, which are treated as holy cows and are not touched, even though they are banned. They are said to enjoy huge public support because of which they have acquired immunity. Even General Musharraf, who was the army chief and the president of Pakistan, pleaded helplessness when it came to taking action against some of the jehadi leaders, afraid of the fallout. The French philosopher, Bernard-Henry Levy, towards the end of his book, Who killed Daniel Pearl, reaches this terrifying conclusion: 'I assert that Pakistan is the biggest rogue of all the rogue states today … what is taking form there, between Islamabad and Karachi, is a black hole compared to which Saddam Hussein's Baghdad was an obsolete dump.'[5]

Since 2003, with the introduction of confidence-building measures such as the opening of the road from Srinagar to Muzaffarabad, the train connectivity between Delhi and Lahore, and increase in trade, India has been endeavouring to normalize relations with Pakistan. However, while Pakistan professes to welcome peaceful relations with India, it encourages the use of its soil and PoK for infiltrating trained and armed terrorists to carry out acts of violence in India. Primarily because of this dichotomy, there is a trust deficit. Therefore, despite India's best efforts, the 'composite diologue' between our countries stands frozen after the terrorist attacks on Mumbai. Pakistan is in a bind; it is treading on a dangerous path where it has to compromise and resort to double-dealing with key terrorist leaders and also draw a distinction between 'good' and 'bad' Taliban.

As far as proliferation of nuclear technology is concerned, Pakistan has had a dubious record. Is it conceivable that the Pakistani president and army chief, Pervez Musharraf, was unaware of the dealings A.Q. Khan had with Libya or North Korea or what was going on in their nuclear installations? How could Khan be using Pakistani Air Force planes to cart his shadowy cargo on his own? Now that he has been exposed, he has been conveniently dumped and put into cold storage. 'The enterprising father of the
