to discuss issues that needed to be raised with Dr Singh. We are now witnessing a historical phase of development of infrastructure. With its estimated hydro-power potential of about 55000 MW, Arunachal is gradually emerging as a potential powerhouse of the country, with around one-third of the country's energy needs being met from what we shall produce here. I perceive that in a decade from now, the Arunachalee people will be amongst the highest per capita income earners in our country.

Besides these major projects, I visualize tremendous potential for tourism, organic farming, floriculture, horticulture, tea, bamboo, handicrafts and cane products and small-scale industry for fruit processing. These activities will result in generation of more jobs for the people. A number of initiatives have been taken by the state government and the Raj Bhawan to encourage people to create self-help groups or become small entrepreneurs, and exploit the potential of the 'gold mine' they are sitting on. As the constitutional head of the state, I see my role as that of a guide, mentor and catalyst and the head 'gaon bura' too. By the end of my tenure, if I am able to earn and justify the sobriquet of being a 'people's governor', my ambition in my second innings would be realized.

Therefore, I got my 'swearing-in oath' framed and put on my desk, so as to be constantly reminded of it. There are two fundamental issues included in our oath, as our constitution framers had conceived it. The first is to uphold the constitution of India and the rule of law, and the second, which I consider to be of equal importance, is to work for the well-being of the people. Besides these, the governor's office has been given a special responsibility for the maintenance of law and order under Article 371 H of the constitution. Thus, I have a somewhat greater span of responsibilities as compared to most other governors.

As soon as we had settled down, I planned a visit to the district of Tirap, which is affected by the spillover of decades of insurgency from the neighbouring state of Nagaland. On 2 February 2008, I flew to Khonsa, the district HQ. I was accompanied by Ankur Garg, an enthusiastic young IAS officer who was to take over as the deputy commissioner of Tirap on the same day (he later joined as
