28

DURING THE PEAK OF UNREST on our college campuses, student leaders from the nine campuses of the University of California asked to see me in Sacramento. I was delighted to see them. During those days, if I'd visited one of their campuses, I'd have started a riot. When I'd been campaigning, I was cheered by students because I was running against an incumbent who was part of the establishment. Now, I was the establishment.

When the delegation arrived in the capitol, some were barefoot and several were wearing torn T-shirts; when I entered the room, they sat silently where they were, some sprawled out on the floor. No one stood up. Then their spokesman began:

"Governor, we want to talk to you, but I think you should realize that it's impossible for you to understand us. . . . It's sad, but it's impossible for the members of your generation to understand your own children. . . .

"You weren't raised in a time of instant communications or satellites and computers solving problems in seconds that previously took hours or days or even weeks to solve. You didn't live in an age of space travel and journeys to the moon, of jet travel or high speed electronics. . . ."

While he paused to take a breath, I said:

"You're absolutely right. We didn't have those things when we were your age. We invented them. . . ."

As a seventeen-year-old college freshman, I'd known something about student protests firsthand. But what occurred on California's campuses during the late 1960s didn't bear any resemblance to our placid protest at Eureka College against an administration plan that would have
