being altruistic. There's a reason why we are willing to share this defense once we have it."

Gorbachev heard the translation of my remarks, but he wasn't listening.

He wouldn't budge from his position. He just sat there smiling and then he said he still didn't believe me when I said the United States would make the SDI available to other countries.

I was getting angrier and angrier.

I realized he had brought me to Iceland with one purpose: to kill the Strategic Defense Initiative. He must have known from the beginning he was going to bring it up at the last minute.

"The meeting is over," I said. "Let's go, George, we're leaving."

When we reached our cars before leaving Reykjavik, Gorbachev said, "I don't know what else I could have done." I said, "I do. You could have said yes." In my diary that night, I wrote,

> He wanted language that would have killed SDI. The price was high but I wouldn't sell and that's how the day ended. All our people thought I'd done exactly right. I'd pledged I wouldn't give away SDI and I didn't, but that meant no deal on any of the arms reductions. He tried to act jovial but I was mad and showed it. Well, the ball is now in his court and I'm convinced he'll come around when he sees how the world is reacting.

I was very disappointed—and very angry.

When I flew home to Washington, the reception I got showed the American people were behind me. They didn't want to surrender the SDI.
