At the outset, let me compliment Gen Manoj Naravane for his excellently written book Four Stars of Destiny. This book takes you through his childhood, his training at the NDA and the IMA, and his journey in the Army until he rose to Four-Star rank as the Chief of the Indian Army. The title of the book is very apt, as no one knows what life's journey would be like. As the Gita elucidates: 'One should do his duty and the results will come by.'

Gen Naravane has put out a very honest account of his journey in this autobiography. You go through his experiences as the youngest child in the family, life as a cadet and how he performed as he worked his way up the various ranks in the Army. The book bares open his personality and character. It is the last part of the book that is even more interesting. Here the author has put down his observations, comments, analysis and feelings on many issues that he faced while leading a competent and professional Army.

A very thorough appraisal of several events and issues has been put down, which will ensure better comprehension for all
