A new rivalry developed over my last years: Virat Kohli versus me. His batting was peaking when my bowling career – my whole career, actually – was culminating. For the record, there's not a better player than an Indian playing spin. This is a fact. And Kohli is one of many players in the great Indian tradition whom I have struggled against. I haven't picked up more than two or three wickets on an average against them. The Bangalore Test in 2005, which we won, was an outlier. There were a couple of other matches too. But by and large, the Indian batsmen largely remained on top of my spin, throughout my career. That's just the way it is.

But we remained on top of their pacers.

Life has a funny way of working things out.
