Police officers from foreign countries visiting India started questioning the ethics of a service that, instead of supporting its own member for furthering the principles that were ideally the service's raison d'être, the authorities there merely derived apparent pleasure out of any discomfiture that may have been caused. These officers even began doubting the bona fides of the authorities' intentions keeping in view the worldwide concern to radically alter the functioning and goals of the law-enforcing agencies.