occupant as to what would happen to the Citizen Warden Scheme, despite the large number of letters the citizen wardens wrote. They finally gave up. Kiran was made to feel unwanted. Any letter or document she sent to the new LG was either ignored or scoffed at.

The focus and priorities totally changed as did the methods of governance. Raj Niwas (where the LG's office is located) was no more open to the masses. A staffer there remarked: 'Now not even a bird will be able to flap its wings and enter without an appointment. The days of easy access to a common man to this house will remain a memory.' And it sure has …

Kiran was moved back to Delhi Police on her request. This time she was appointed as the joint commissioner (training) but was not permitted even a toehold at the Police Headquarters, from where all other joint commissioners of police functioned and coordinated all their activities. The Police Training College, from where she discharged her responsibilities of supervising the training and steering the course, was located far away from the HQ, in the extreme rural end of south-west Delhi. The institution itself was in a rundown condition. The place was starved of funds, isolated and neglected. It was 'begging' to be equipped with the latest machines and gadgets that could provide the cutting edge to the next generation of the Delhi Police. Kiran saw in them the future of her force and the security of her country. Her tenure as joint commissioner (training) was in two stages, with a break in between of 41 days, which she spent as inspector general of police, Chandigarh.
