checking our things for ourselves before she detected our lapses. We were on the road, correcting, directing and helping the people. The police stations got the resources – human, material and financial – which were earlier completely missing. It was amazing how soon changes came about. The police force began to feel responsible [enough] to patrol the villages and slum areas around Chandigarh to prevent night crimes. Women NGOs were invited to be present in the police stations, if they so wanted to assist in responding to women complainants. Meetings with school and college principals were held to check the eve-teasing menace. It was amazing to see how Mrs Bedi found the resources to address all the issues. Special Branch personnel, who would earlier idle around, went for a few hours daily to colleges at odd timings in plain clothes, thus putting eve-teasers on the run. Welfare of families of the police personnel was an equal priority. Computer centres for police officers' children and crèches for children of policewomen were established. Get-togethers were organized, where all ranks met. The focus of attention was women and children. The drunken men in the police force came to realize they had no option but to behave. Families [of police personnel] felt emboldened now, for they knew they had a guardian amongst them.

So did the public. Beat officers began calling on the residents of the city at their homes to check if anyone had anything to report. From a reactive to proactive and preventive policing, the path ahead was set.

But someone was really upset, the home secretary – a woman (Anuradha Gupta) – who, prior to Kiran's arrival, was, in fact, the de facto IG of Chandigarh, even when there was a de jure one present. The home secretary was transferring, posting and suspending many police personnel, apart from calling for explanations and warning all ranks of the police force, totally bypassing the authority and jurisdiction of the IG Ram Pal Singh. These claims are testified to by the documents that follow.
