these proposals and gave appropriate instructions. The results were instant. In the revised estimates for the Home Ministry, Delhi Police got additional funds to obtain the aforementioned items. Kiran, present in the meeting, requested for the assistance of the Home Ministry to procure the equipment. The concerned officials willingly offered to do so. This was a breakthrough that removed all the obstacles in their procurement. Committed officials from the Police Training College teamed up with officials of the Home Ministry and achieved the seemingly unachievable in record time. Within the same budget period, all the equipment was procured and made operational. The multimedia gadgets, comprising cameras, projectors, visualizers, screens and speakers, made possible simultaneous interactive learning, even through a single teacher, in 16 classrooms at the same time.

Kiran modernized the training college to the extent that it could provide state-of-the-art professional skills to the police personnel. Also, she provided certain commonplace, but essential, items without informing the home minister and the police commissioner. These items could be procured by local initiatives and the top brass need not be involved, she felt. Surprisingly, such items had remained unattended to! These items were needed for the trainees' welfare, and included a canteen, a well-stocked grocery store, a bank, a milk booth (with health foods available there), regular and adequate water supply, a proper bus transport system for the faculty and a provision for making telephone calls.

The quality of training was of prime importance. The practical aspects of police work were prioritized, with the emphasis being on hands-on training and putting theory into practice. Additional courses were provided on important topics such as gender sensitization, white-collar crimes, cyber crimes and giving evidence in courts. Adventurous attitudes among the trainees were greatly encouraged.

The staff members at the training college were not necessarily a motivated lot, as most of them were of the view that a posting at a training institution implied being 'put aside'! Their mindsets had to be changed and they had to be convinced about their vital role so that they could teach and motivate at the same time.

How could all this be done, when most of the staff had grievances against the personnel policies of the Delhi Police? Kiran once again faced the situation that she once did at Tihar Jail, where she had to make the inmates realize that each one of them was responsible for his/her own perceptions. In the present case, she pointed out that if they thought that training was a punishment then they were punishing themselves as well as their performance. She also emphasized that it was always one's own decision as to how one treated oneself. The influence of the peer group was very high on these police officers. Each of them was highly dependent on social acceptance.

As she had earlier done at Tihar, Kiran introduced the Vipassana meditation programme in the Police Training College too. The basic purpose was to enable the staff members to police themselves and teach themselves before they could police and teach others. But they were a harder lot to change as they had been stuck in a rut for a long time. In this case, Kiran decided to volunteer for undergoing the ten-day Vipassana meditation course herself, which motivated the training faculty to do likewise. A major breakthrough was thus achieved. After the course, some higher-level staff members who were heavily addicted to certain substances, including tobacco and alcohol, declared publicly that they would give up such addictions. This was a major confession for a senior to make in the presence of other colleagues, juniors and trainees.

When the leaders lead, followers do not merely follow, they join in. Trainees wanted to experience
