Since she was clearly the product of her family and her own personal choice, she did not let that aspect come into conflict with her service. Her family support was the biggest blessing as she often says. Her unconventional style of living was unique at that time in the sense that she had two homes, which were equally open to her parents and parents-in-law. This lifestyle broke new grounds for an Indian working woman. She set new trends of living and working, and set in motion a whole new way of thinking. As did her family. Soon after becoming a mother on 19 September 1975, Kiran's parents came visiting her in Delhi (where she had been posted), and realized how much she needed their support in bringing up the baby (a daughter), while also performing her police duties. Kiran too did not let them go back to Amritsar. Instead, she asked her youngest sister Anu also to move to Delhi so that she could benefit from the better tennis facilities available in the capital. Now that the whole family was staying in Kiran's house, the place became a beehive of activity! Brij greatly respected Kiran's decisions all through, while he himself chose to stay on in Amritsar, so that he could carry on with his work and also attend to household matters.

As Kiran observed, somewhat presciently: 'I was determined to live life on my own terms. I had been brought up with a vision never to be dependent or get "domesticated", but to fly high as far as I was willing to go. But alongside I wanted to share the joy and the glory with all those whom I loved, respected and cared for.'

Kiran's world continued to expand and go beyond her immediate family, as she took on new challenges in life.