determination that had brought about such remarkable changes in the mindsets of the inmates that it was only by seeing the ground situation for oneself that one could believe it.

Another controversy related to Kiran's clash with members of the legal profession. In 1988 Kiran came into conflict with a section of lawyers and even while the Justice Wadhwa Commission (enquiring into the matter) was still compiling its report, she was ignominiously transferred to the CRPF (Central Reserve Police Force) as a commandant. Such a post is given to an officer of eight years' standing, but as she had already put in sixteen years, it was obvious that the lawyers' lobby had succeeded in 'punishing' her. Rajiv Gandhi, then prime minister, read about this and sent for her. Kiran met the PM. He straightaway asked her where she wanted to be posted. Narcotics? Kiran said that would be good but in the soft area of correction. The PM said no, she should go for a hard area. She should get these drug traffickers, all of them and go all out to do so! Kiran was amazed to get her new orders within 24 hours. She left for the Narcotics Control Bureau after one day's work in the CRPF office. The agitating lawyers, of course, were stumped.