Taylor and Pietersen building a partnership, KP decides to walk off with the South Africans instead. As Taylor stops at the rope, waiting for him, he gestures dismissively towards him, shooing him to go back in. It's not clear exactly what he has against Taylor, who bats bravely and with good judgement to support KP with 34 valuable runs, but his body language and dismissiveness on the field suggests something that everyone is uncomfortable with.

Later that day, he tells Andy Flower that Taylor is nowhere near good enough to play Test cricket. Either side of this, he plays one of the most exhilarating, brutal innings I have ever seen. He destroys the South African team over the course of five hours, scoring 149 runs, the ball flying over heads, through fielders and sending the crowd into manic celebrations. Little does everyone know though that this is an innings symbolic of something other than sheer expression: it's a statement of unrest.

There have been rumours throughout the Test match that KP has been messaging the South African team. I don't believe this at first as it trickles through the dressing room. In an era where we have all made an effort beyond anything else to establish trust in each other, it seems unthinkable – it would be tantamount to betrayal. As Kevin comes out at the end of the Test, telling the cameras, expecting to to be showered with praise for his innings, that 'being in that dressing room, for me, it's hard', it begins to surface that there is actually truth in the rumours. It turns out he has messaged the South African team saying that he can't believe they haven't tried to bowl to Strauss around the wicket yet.

As we are all told, there is sadness and then anger expressed on behalf of Andrew Strauss, who walks back into the dressing room from his own press conference with all the colour drained from his face. This is his last Test series for England, retiring and letting the captaincy go at the end of this, trying to hand the baton on with the team in an undeniably better condition than when he took over, and this is the way that he will leave. He will play his 100th Test next week at Lord's, where Kevin will be left out, and the rest of the series played out under a cloud, the press dragging the story around as if there is no cricket happening any more.

From this point on, my trust in Pietersen is gone. I don't think he should be let back into the side. I think what he's done is where we should draw the line. We didn't get on or not get on – we were just different people wanting
