system, where I could instead channel this kind of calm. Up here, it doesn't sound disturbing to want that. I'm not beating myself up for hoping to be this other person or for wishing to have more than I do here. I'm just accepting that this lives within me, the dream of an alternative life, stirring inside, looking for something to hook its claws into. I look over to the cotton mills and Turf Moor and the schools and the cricket club and then sense the comparative stillness here, only very occasionally broken by the shuffling of sheep and the stroking of the wind and feel, with a longing thrill, like maybe there is more outside of this. More meaning. Someone else I could be, someone other than James Anderson. If I found that thing, I'd cling to it for all it was worth; I'd try to never let it go. I eat the ham sandwich and crisps. I check my watch: three hours until school is over. I'd better get back. I'll be here again tomorrow. I'll miss it until then.
