England win in dramatic circumstances, Shaun Udal spinning the team to victory at the death. We have not won there in 21 years, so coming away with a drawn series in such foreign, hostile conditions is a real effort and achievement.

Despite the constant sense of feeling at sea and inside a different person's body, I am asked to stay in India for the one-day series that follows – seven games in places not used to housing international cricket in an effort to get the game out to the further reaches of a country who are totally head over heels in love with the game. Being on tour in India is as close as any cricketer will get to experiencing what it's like to be the most famous person in the world. If you are a professional cricketer of any standard, you cannot move for being hounded. The level of security and scrutiny is so intense that it leads to a state of constant, fizzing claustrophobia. Think Beatlemania but, when they run out at Shea Stadium, the Beatles are having leather rocks bowled at their heads while people scream. There is nowhere that is safe from public adoration and/or attention.

When I come out of my room, the cleaner wants a photograph, the guy who delivers room service wants one too. I check in at the front desk, the person there wants a picture as well. During downtime, it is advised for players not to even leave their rooms. On the few chances we try, once even a single person notices who we are, it's an avalanche within seconds. If we go to a restaurant, we are bombarded, looking up out of the window and finding a crush outside of the street of what feels like thousands of people, all trying to touch us, shouting things at us, wanting more pictures. Even in the hotel, security is in the restaurant or the lobby to try and stop people from encroaching on our space. On this tour, I am finding it quite stressful when it combines with my disorientation on the pitch. It is a long, tough experience; genuinely quite stressful. I am beginning to learn that sometimes, if you dream for your world to get bigger, and you somehow achieve that, the strange consequence to it is your world also feeling much, much smaller.

The towns are not set up for cricket teams to move through on this tour. I am sleeping in rooms with fire doors out the back that leave a four-inch gap and let mosquitos in at night. I am wearing a hoodie in boiling hot heat, the hood zipped up to cover everything but a tiny area of my face to breathe through, getting bitten, sweating through my clothes. Meanwhile, as I try to
