and video cameras. A large black woman threw herself on the desk, stood up, and began ranting first in Swahili and then in English, demanding that the World Social Forum's entrance fees must be reduced to allow greater access for people from the Kabira slums. She gave this loud press conference from the top of the desk and then vanished, taking the crowd with her. 'Yes,' I thought, 'now here is a country I can work with.'

After twenty-four years of misrule, Daniel Arap Moi was finally removed from power at the Kenyan election of 2002. His replacement, Mwai Kibaki of the Rainbow Coalition, was elected chiefly on an anti-corruption platform, but by the time we arrived it wasn't looking so cool. Despite the new regime having gained support and momentum out of the movement for constitutional reform, we found that they were little better than Moi and were carrying out a whole new rash of injustices and oppressions. Kibaki himself, in fact, wasn't quite the new broom that was hoped for: a scion of the old regime, he developed an alarming capacity for suppressing free speech. The offices of the Kenyan newspaper The Standard had been raided by the police six months before we arrived and the editorial staff had been incarcerated for half a day. The Standard had managed to capture this brutality on their security cameras, and, excitingly from our perspective, were able to report it in full. But an atmosphere of intimidation lingered, and it became clear that the press existed there in a state of threat, which encouraged us to think we might help them.

A company called Kroll Associates, who did private investigative work into businesses and assets, looking at accounts and security systems, were commissioned by the Kibaki regime to find out what had happened to the money embezzled by former president Moi. It looked like Kibaki wanted some of this money but also, clearly, he wanted to use this information to blackmail Moi into compliance with the new dispensation. (Moi was still a powerful figure on the scene.) The report revealed that up to £1 billion had been channelled abroad by Moi, his sons and their associates through a litany of companies and banks. The report was explosive in that it names the banks in Zurich and London, and gives details of further properties and commercial interests in America and Kenya. The staff at Kroll didn't pull any punches. These extracts concern a Moi associate, accused of being one of the biggest money-launderers in Geneva:
