From our point of view, the leak supported the idea that oppressed media organisations could suddenly be freed when a story that mattered to them – and which they couldn't reveal on their own – was given legitimacy and the oxygen of international exposure first. WikiLeaks was the publisher of last resort, but also an untouchable platform: we had proved it, and established a modus operandi for the future.

We had other business in Kenya, culminating in a document we published in November 2008 detailing cases where, in seeking to confront a criminal organisation known as the Mungiki, the Kenyan police had ignored any kind of consideration of the basic principles of evidence, due process or justice, and had engaged in the extra-judicial murders of hundreds of people. We published this information in the form of a heart-rending report called 'The Cry of Blood', containing the stories of some of the disappeared – 'a 26-year-old mechanic', 'a farm help in Kanunga', 'a taxi driver in Eastleigh', 'a hawker in Baba Dogo' – and photographs of some of the victims and the places their bodies had been dumped. Police had sometimes demanded large sums of money from family members to spare the lives of arrested men.

This was a huge, shocking story, and two of the human rights activists who had helped us, Oscar Kungara and Paul Ulu, were later followed by the police and shot dead in the street in central Nairobi. We made this front-page material on WikiLeaks and made the point that the possible murder of at least 349 people by an out-of-control police force was implied by the material we were seeing. Our commentary made it clear that this was comparable to what happened in Chile under Pinochet. And this was not happening in the Congo, or in neighbouring Sudan: Kenya is a place with significant business development and a sophisticated relationship with the West.

We kept at it, kept publishing stuff that the African papers were too frightened to publish, and eventually Philip Alston, an Australian who was the UN Special Reporter on Extra-Judicial Killings, came to Nairobi for a week to document what had happened and what had been revealed. The issue was now out and has never really gone away since. We had worked on it non-stop while fighting to breathe life into WikiLeaks. Kenya was a massive test case. We gave it everything we had and our work began to change the picture. We wanted to do better and do more, but were happy
