in China or Russia or Libya than in France, Britain and America. But some of those cultures couldn’t believe they could be subject to scrutiny. Some day, it will be understood why those cultures felt so immune from legal investigation.

I would not see America again. It was made clear to me that the Pentagon were trying to determine my whereabouts, and I had to cancel several appearances in the States. The reasons for this may already have been set in train by a narrow and paranoid understanding of our work, but then, on 26 May 2010, a serving soldier in Iraq, Private Bradley Manning, was arrested on suspicion of supplying secret information. Our deniability structures, invented all those years ago back in Australia, made it impossible to know if Manning was the source for any of our material. Our servers do not supply that kind of information, even to me. But I was certain of one thing: if he had supplied such information, then he was a hero of democracy and justice who had taken a role in saving lives. I went to sleep that night hoping the free world would be kind to him.