know, were scared or under surveillance. I wanted desperately to protect them and hoped that Stockholm might prove to be the haven I had long envisaged for our work. Speaking honestly, I would have to say I thought A—— was a little neurotic. But our night together was unremarkable. We had sex several times and the next day everything seemed fine between us.

A—— was in charge of the microphone at a press conference a day or two later and there was a lunch afterwards, which she attended, along with other journalists and a woman called W——, who appeared to have assisted at the press conference and who I remember was wearing a nice pink sweater. I won't be winning any prizes for clairvoyant of the year, or, indeed, for gentleman of the year, when it comes to these women, but the situation seemed relaxed and I was not aware of any threat to anybody or any wrongdoing. W—— said she worked at the Natural History Museum and offered to show me some of the private rooms there. I agreed, so after lunch and a quick shopping trip to buy computer parts she and I broke off to go to the museum. Some of the staff in there seemed to know her and we looked around before going to see a movie about life beneath the sea, then going our separate ways.

That night, A—— had arranged a crayfish party, a traditional occasion at that time of year in Sweden, and I went along to meet up with her. This was the day after the day she later claimed I had raped her. A—— was there at the party and seemed totally happy, laughing and drinking with me and my friends and her friends until late. We were sitting outside the party and she sent a Tweet saying she was 'with the coolest people in the world'. It became obvious she had told people about us sleeping together and it emerged, later, that she had taken a picture of me when I was asleep in her bed and pasted it on her Facebook page. I was now supposed to be moving to stay with other people, a couple of guys from the Pirate Party – a Swedish political party that campaigns for copyright reform, among other things – but A—— insisted I come back and continue to stay with her. The arrangement had always been that I would move to the guys' flat after A—— got back to her apartment from her trip, but she said it was cool to stay at hers and I went back with her. And that was how the situation remained for the next five nights.

Some other evenings I spent with W——. But A—— was still working with me on political meetings and so on, including a dinner we went to with Rick Falkvinge, head of the Pirate Party. He was offering to house a server