XIV: IRAQ WAR DIARIES

Much like the Afghan war logs, the records from Iraq also represent American soldiers' reports on noteworthy incidents, this time in Iraq between 2004 and 2009. There are almost 400,000 individual incident reports in the cache. The reports extracted here indicate that when witnessing abuse of detainees by Iraqi army and police, American troops simply recorded the incidents as instructed by their superiors, but, as a matter of policy, no other action was taken to prevent such abuses. As with the Afghan war logs, some material has been redacted.

These seven entries detail incidents of civilian casualties caused by British troops in October, November and December 2008. Like other similar reports throughout the logs, they give an insight into the chaotic nature of the battlefield and the constant risk – and consequences of – mistakes by coalition troops. Some of the information in each report has been removed and some acronyms have been expanded for the sake of readability, but each original report can be identified by its number and read in full on the WikiLeaks website. Some of the logs were redacted by WikiLeaks on release.
