The crowd go ape-shit even if you just walk out onto the field prior to the game for a bit of a warm-up. I mean, you have never seen people who love cricket as much as these Indian chaps. And obviously they get revved up by all the music blaring out from the PA system and watching the gorgeous cheerleaders – who, in 2010, were all South African girls. What a bonus. We were in India with a squad of lovely South African lasses following us around. I got to know a couple quite well.

I always used to love coming to India as it is – especially after the match-fixing issue was settled and I knew I wasn't going to get arrested the minute I set foot in the country. But ja, India is a special place. There are challenges, as I've mentioned, but it's a gentle country. You can see it in the way the locals drive. There are no road signs and the traffic looks chaotic, but everyone drives slowly and they even stop for a dog crossing the road.

India is always full of surprises. A totally unexpected surprise came my way recently when I was offered a role in a Bollywood movie that will start filming at the end of May 2011. I'm not sure what the part is or what I'm supposed to do, but my agent has told me it's very good money for only a day's work. I should probably find out a little more about it, though. Playing a badboy cricketer who gets involved in match fixing probably won't be the smartest career move.

Umpires

The debate on the use of technology has been raging for some time now. Should technology be used to help umpires make the correct decisions? Lord knows, I've seen some umpires in my career who needed all the help they could get. In modern professional sport there is a lot of money involved, and making the correct call can have a monumental financial impact on both players and their teams. One argument is based on the premise that there should never be any doubt about whether a football has crossed the goal line, a tennis ball has touched the tramline, or a cricket ball has nicked a bat. Now that we have the technology to make the correct calls, we should use it, even if it slows the game down.

I'm not so sure, though.

Although I'm not what you'd call a traditionalist by any stretch of the imagination, I have been on the receiving end of some shocking decisions in my career. However, I, for one, would be very sad to see the human element disappear from cricket. And I'm not a fan of the referral system
